Syn. gelinde, sanft, sachte, teife, gemach, gimplich. In the words gelinde, sanft, sachte, teife, the effect denoted is a slight touch or contact; in gemach a slight movement. Gemach geben signifies "not to hurry." Das Gelinde and das Sanfte affects the feelings, das Teife, the hearing. Das Gelinde gives merely no painful or a less painful sensation; das Sanfte produces at the same time an agreeable one. Thus, figuratively one would not say gelinde, but sanfte Vorstellungen; for it is intended that they should be agreeable; on the other hand, one would say gelinde Strafen of such as are not intended to be too severe. Gimplich implies more especially humanity and kindness.

Syn. gelingen, gerat(h)en, einschlagen, glücken. When chance favours, or outward circumstances hrlng about, the accomplishment of what is attempted or intended, we use glücken. But when the success proceeds from the judicious choice of the means or depends upon our own skill or prudence, we use gelingen. Gerat(h)en and einschlagen are said of the thing or work itself, gelingen principally of the means employed. Einschlagen implies a greater degree of uncertainty in the issue, a greater effect of chance than gerat(h)en. A painter may say, Dieses Gemälde ist mir wohl gerat(h)en, but not, es ist gut eingeschlagen.

We say, "das hat a great or not the least Interesse for me," instead of, "das erregt a great or uot the least Interesse." Syn. irre, unfähig, sinnlos, berrückt, wahn-sinnig, wahnwüthig. Irre is used of one whose ideas, during a state of illness, are void of any inward connection among themselves. Insignig and sinnlos indicate a deprivation of the use of the understanding and senses, occasioned by any violent passion; in the Irrenstille, however, this privation begins with the understanding, whence it spreads its baneful effects over the senses; with the Irrenstille it at once stuns the senses, and thereby arrests the functions of the understanding. — Irrenstille, Berrücktheit, Wahn-sinn, and Wahnwüth differ from each other by their duration. Der Irrenstille finds himself in a transitory state, which vanishes with its short-lived cause, whereas the condition of the Wahn-sinnigen and Wahnwüthigen is permanent. Der Berrückte is distinguished from both the latter in this, that he lives in a continual waking dream. Wahn-sinn implies the entire bereavement of the use of the understanding; in which a man takes that to be really true which he merely imagines. Wahnwüth manifests itself by a profusion of ideas; but as they are unconnected and confused, they are often absurd. The Wahnwüthige is talkative, his ideas are extremely mutable; the Wahn-sinnige will often continue quiet and apparently void of thought.

Syn. Irrt(h)um, Irrung, Versehen. Irrt(h)um indicates not only the action by which any Versehen takes place, but also the matter and nature of the erroneous judgment. Thus Irrt(h)ümer in religious creeds, which by some are considered as true, are false doctrines. Irrt(h)ümer are unintentionally erroneous judgments; Irrungen are undesignedly faulty actions. Versehen arise from the mistaking of the false for the true, the wrong for the right. Irrt(h)ümer are avoided by reflection, Versehen by attention. Vid. Verurt(h)elt.

Syn. Kalbau'nen, Engeweibe, Gebärme, Geströße. Kalbau'nen (related to the Greek χολός) is used only of slaughtered animals and in culinary language; Engeweibe on the contrary, is said likewise of men. The Roman haruspices inspected the Engeweibe, not the Kalbau'nen, of the beasts sacrificed. Kalbau'nen is nearly related to Gebärme, for both signify the same parts of the animal body; the former, however, only in so far as they are prepared for food. Hence the Gebärme of fish and birds are not called Kalbau'nen, but Gebärme or Engeweibe. In scientific language Geströße is distinguished from Engeweibe and Gebärme as signifying properly only the mesentery or fatty wrinkled skin in the middle of the Gebärme; whereas Engeweibe signifies all the inner parts of the animal body, and Gebärme the canals containing the Geströße.

Syn. kalt, froſtig, kälte, froſt. Kälte is the absence of heat in any degree: froſt only in a higher degree. We call a body falt when it has a less degree of warmth than our own body. froſt, however, is that degree of kälte which freezes water. Kälte, therefore, begins to be froſt at 32° Fahrenheit. If we judge of kälte merely from sensation, we call it froſt when it causes contraction of the skin, shivering, etc.; vid. ſchetterfroſt. Figuratively we call any one falt who is deficient in warmth of sentiment. froſtig is that which excites no perceptibly agreeable feeling in others. A falt man must necessarily be a froſtiget poet; for he who is himself void of sentiment can excite none by his language in others; vid. kaltſinnig.

Syn. kämpfen, fechten, ringen, streiten. When several persons mutually resist each other, they fressen together, and this may take place even by mere contradiction in words. They fechten when they endeavour to do one another bodily harm; the aim of the streiter being to wound his adversary. Kämpfen implies a greater exertion and expense of bodily strength; ringen, a most painful and persevering conflict, as instead of weapons the combatants only use their limbs, and the victory can only be won by the entire exhaustion of one or the other.

Syn. Kaufmann, Handelsmann, Krämer. The term Kaufmann virtually implies that the goods in which one carries on a business are purchased by one. Handelsmann is more comprehensive than Kaufmannschaft. He must therefore deal in many articles in order to obtain a quick return of the usually small capital he has to embark.

Syn. I. Kraft, Vermögen, Stärke. Kraft actually produces the effect; Vermögen is capable of producing it. Kraft is active and operative, Vermögen can become so. Stärke is a determinate and more especially a higher degree of Kraft. Kraft is the opposite to Schwach or weak, Stärke to Schwachheit. A child even has a certain Kraft, otherwise it could do nothing; but it has as yet no Stärke.

Syn. II. Kraftlos, unträftig, schwach. A thing is unträftig when it fails to produce an effect, whatever may be the cause of the inefficiency; kraftlos and schwach, when the cause is want of force (Kraft). Kraftlos and schwach are used as well with reference to living as to inanimate objects; unträftig is said only of the latter. A thing may be unträftig for any one and yet not be kraftlos. The kraftlos speech will be kraftlos for one who does not attentively listen to it. The opposite to schwach is stark, as having a higher degree of force. The Schwache has no great degree of strength, but the Stärkliche has none at all. Any whole is called schwach from the feebness of its parts, and stark from their multiplicity. The whole may, therefore, be schwach, though each single part is stark. The army when composed of but few men is schwach, kraftlos when exhausted by long marches and fatigue.

Syn. krank, fleh, ungefun, unpaß, krankhaft. Ungefun signifies, in general, every defect in health, including the smallest perceptible degree and such as is unattended with any considerable pain or debility. Krank is said of one who suffers from some particular and determinate disorder. Fleh indicates the absence of health in a higher degree by which it is distinguished from ungefun; but it is said of those whose ailments are not among those enumerated by the nosologist, but which are characterized by their own peculiar marks, crises, etc. In this it is distinguished from unpaß. Unpaß or unpaßlich is said of one who, without being krank, is not altogether quite well. Kranklich implies the being subject to various attacks from which krankheiten may easily arise. Krankhaft designates such a condition as has some resemblance to a really transt state. We do not say "a krankhafter man," but "a krankhafter pulse."

Syn. Lache, See (ber) Pfuhl, Pflüze, Sumpf, Teich, Weiher. A See is not only the largest inland standing water, but it may also have an outlet, and consequently be connected with rivers. Its water is, moreover, pure and is, for the most part, inhabited by different kinds of fish. A Pfuhl is smaller than a See, and has no outlet; it is sometimes limpid, at other times turbid, and may or may not contain fish. A Pflüze is a smaller Pfuhl, which may disappear as easily as it is formed. A Sumpf is distinguished from the two last in having its waters over a soft soil which gives way under the feet. He who is not sure of his way in traversing a wood may easily stick fast in Sumpfen. In some boggy districts the Sumpfe do not dry up even in summer. Lache is peculiar to Upper Germany; its signification is the same as Pfuhl in Lower Germany. Teich and Weiher are distinguished from the rest as being artificial and destined as reservoirs for fish. Both, however, and especially the former, are often without fish and only serve as an embellishment to pleasure-grounds.

Syn. lächerlich, belachenswert(h), tomißlich, posif(e)rich, burlesk. The Belachenswert(h)e deserves to be laughed at, even if it should not always excite laughter. The lächerliche is, properly, what really provokes laughter; it is, however, often confounded with belachenswert(h). The really Belachenswert(h)e should be the only source of the lächerliche, but poets by humorous combinations and associations can often make things lächerlich which are not at all belachenswert(h). The tomißliche is the lächerliche in action. Everything tomißlich is therefore lächerlich, but everything lächerlich is not tomißlich.

The Poss(e)rtliche (droll) is more especially the lächerliche in gesture. The monkey on account of his lächerlichen motions is a poss(e)rtliches Thier (droll animal). Children, also, are poss(e)rtlich, when in their games they imitate the serious manner of older persons. The Surtste consists in a lächerlichen representation of what is great and important. Syn. Landestind, Eingeborner, Einheimischer, Inländer, Eingeseffener, Anfässiger. He who has his usual abode in a country is einheimisch, he has his Heimat(h) (home) there. But with regard to a certain part of the country, as a town or village, we also call him who has his usual abode there einheimisch, though with reference to the entire country he is an Inländer. One is called an Eingeseffener in as far as he belongs to a certain district of the government or the administrative distribution of a country. An Anfässiger is one who possesses some landed property in the country. An Eingeborner must have been born in the country. An Inländer may be an Einheimischer, but he can never be an Eingeborner in a country, however long he may have been einheimisch in it. An Eingeborner, in so far as he has the rights and duties of a subject of the state, is a Landestind.

Syn. Laub, Blatt. Blätter is said of all kinds of plants, Laub is peculiar only to trees. We say cabbage-Blatt as well as oak-Blatt. Flowers have Blätter, but no Laub. On trees Laub signifies collectively a great quantity of Blätter; Blatt, on the contrary, a single leaf. When the Laub falls off, the Blätter drop, and when trees get Laub, they get Blätter. Hence Laub has no plural.

Syn. I. leer, ledig. Leer is what contains nothing; ledig implies that a thing has contained or would contain something, but does not. A bottle is leer, because nothing is in it; it is ledig inasmuch as it can be filled. leer, however, is used in both these senses. A place is ledig when no one possesses it who may hinder another from taking it. In speaking of incorporeal objects we can only use leer, and not ledig. An ignorant man is called a leerer Kopf, and not a lediger Kopf. So we also say leere promises or words, and not ledige. An unmarried person is called ledig, because no connection exists which binds him from contracting marriage. In like manner any post that is vacant is called leerbetagt, a place or service ledig. We say the throne is leerbetagt.

Syn. II. leer, wüste, öde. A place is leer from want of objects, wüste, in as far as it cannot, on that account, be inhabited by man, and öde, when we find in it nothing that is useful or agreeable to him, more especially the absence of other human beings. Bottles, dishes, pockets, boxes, etc., are leer when there is nothing more in them; a country lies wüste when it is uninhabitable; the cell of a nun is neither leer nor wüste, but its inmate may find it öde when she seeks in vain for what alone could satisfy the yearnings of her heart.

Syn. I. leichtfertig, lose, mut(h)willig, ver-büht. Those are leichtfertig who do not consider whether their pranks are hurtful to others or not. lose are those who somewhat outstep the proper bounds, or do things in joke or from malicious pleasure which they, at least, do not think wrong or hurtful. We say a lofer, leichtfertiger boy, and the same also of a girl. Those are mut(h)willig who intend some injury by their freaks. Leichtfertig is, therefore, a lesser fault than mut(h)willig, although in common parlance the latter is often used for the former and without any bad accessory idea. Great reproach is implied when we call a female leichtfertig; this, however, may originate merely from leichtsin. Ver-büht is an epithet of still greater reproach.

Syn. II. leichtsinnig, flatterhaft. Leichtsinnig indicates the inability to receive sufficiently strong impressions from objects with respect to their causes; flatterhaft with regard to their effects. A leichtsinniger man stakes what is of most importance to him, and forgets directly the greatest losses, because, from want of attention, the most important things make no impression on him. An effect of this disposition is flatterhaftigkeit, or the rapidity with which a man hurries from one object of his choice to another.

Syn. lieblich, Sätmetösel, Günstling. A Lieblich is preferred to all others and has the first place in the affections of the person by whom he is beloved; a Sätmetösel is the one most tenderly fostered and petted, often indeed more than is proper. Günstling is one to whom another extends his special favour or Günst. The Sätmetösel is always a lieblich, but not inversely. The great and rich have their Günstlinge, whosometimes are their lieblich. The poor man has no Günstling, but he can have his lieblich, though it may be only among animals. One is therefore the Günstling of a superior, and the superior has an inferior for his Günstling; one can, however, have a lieblich among one's equals and even among one's superiors.

Syn. Loos, Schicksal, Ungesähr, Zufall. We employ Loos with reference to chance, Schicksal when we think of a higher will. When we are satisfied with our Loos we call it an agreeable one, and when discontented, a wretched one; but the happy man blesses his Schicksal, and the miserable one curses it. Zufall implies an event the course of which we do not know; Ungesähr that to which we ascribe the origin of an event. A Zufall arises from Ungesähr, and Ungesähr leads to many Zufällen. Loos is distinguished from these terms as being a Zufall dependent on luck or misfortune; nay, often on a whole series.

We pachten anything when we obtain by contract a right to the usufruct of a thing; we miet(h)en it when we acquire only its use.
